Opening The Call: Warm Up, Community Q's

02:00 - Josh Asks: What Do You See As The Next Shift In The Biz-Opp World, As It Feels Like There Hasn't Been Any Real Innovation In A While, So It's Hard To Create A Great and Novel Offer?

It takes about two years for the market to cycle through, and we have about another year or so before anything is likely to change in a major way - it can't really be rushed because most mass-market biz-opps are tied to some type of technological innovation. For example, Sam Ovens leveraged the Facebook ad network early on, and solutions like Stripe, Clickfunnels, and so on drove ease of us/accessibility for more people to come into the industry. Same thing with YouTube, Google, Amazon, and so on. It's technology that removes limitations - early on it was very difficult to even get a merchant account, and today you just sign up for Stripe. We had to custom code all pages, versus using something like Clickfunnels, and so on.

So to spot the next big change and wave, we need to be on the lookout for technological innovation that can remove limitations in the market. Then we can use the POV process to change the perception of that technology and remove limitations for our market. But until the technology exists, we can't remove that limitation from their POV.

05:54 - Josh Asks: Will There Be Technology That Removes Limitations People Have For Creating Offers, Or Is That Already Here and It's More About Mindset?

It's more about mindset - the mind is a bit of a trickster and limits us.

Because we experience reality through the filter of our senses, interpreting and reconstructing data into a mental model of what we're experiencing rather than directly interacting with reality itself, our mind has a lot of power to trick us (in pursuit of keeping us safe!).

And as a result, all our obstacles are within us, rather than outside of us. We are experiencing reality internally - removed from the 3D environment and constructed in our minds based on sensory input. We just assume it's happening outside of us exactly as we've constructed it internally. This means we are often looking for solutions in the wrong place and this is why mindset is everything - it's our perception we can control and shift, rather than the world around us. But when we do this, the world we experience/interact with around us changes dramatically because of this perceptive shift.

This helps us understand why some people have such different and disparate outcomes - it's not that we're working harder or luckier than other people, but we have different perspectives and perceptions. Very successful people tend to be more in control of their perceptions and keep them focused on positives, gains, and growth in the direction they desire.

10:00 - Riddhi Asks: Where Do You See The Funnel Building/Design Market Going - I'm Not Seeing Many Opportunities?

If we understand the bigger players in the market, then we can understand the economic spread of the market and extrapolate where it's going. For example, most Clickfunnels users are stuck below $10k per month, according to a friend Alen was discussing this with recently. They're estimated to have about 350,000 users, but only 3800 are millionaires. Somewhere between 250,000-320,000 of the remainder are stuck under $5k. This tells us there's a massive lack in the space still - they have the tools but they don't know what to do with them now. And the more people that come in, the wider the distance between people who do know what to do and those who don't.

And so if only 1% of their user base is succeeding and reaching the promised outcome, then they don't have the capability to succeed yet. For Riddhi, this means that as more people come in who don't know what they're doing, it creates a larger contrast against those who DO in a positive way - like Riddhi. So, as the market expands, her expertise becomes more apparent and valuable - it's easier to stand out.

Furthermore, as more people come into the ecosystem, it raises the price of everything, which means the work that is done HAS to be higher quality to get results, and so people hiring have no choice but to seek out better help to succeed - paying higher prices for it to avoid opportunity cost and wasted time/resources. So, all we need to do is keep getting better and better, and we'll have more opportunities and choices. There's lots of abundance and opportunity in the world; there's no shortage of money.

Alen's biggest epiphany with mindset is that the things we buy don't have a "bank account" - the people who make/own it do. When we buy an object, we give money for the object and experience it as giving money TO the object ("I bought that car, etc."). But we didn't actually give money to the object, as the object cannot hold money. Only people/entities can. Knowing this and other ways the mind works makes it easier for us to redirect some of the money circulating our way.

Alen suggests Riddhi has a self-defeating assumption that everyone is broke and cannot afford her, but in general, people will find the money for things they want and believe will help them - all we have to do is deliver on our promises to increase trust/certainty, and we'll be able to get clients. She can also shift from serving 0-1 to serving 1-100 people to amplify existing momentum rather than trying to build momentum for them, as this is much more difficult and not within her control - there's a lot of gravity holding 0-1 folks back.

18:16 - Ryšard Asks: What Percentage Should We Look For Book A Call On The Back End of AC Funnel?

Alen doesn't look at book a call rates, but rather the buy-through rate as that's what really matters. 1 out of 100 front end buyers going on to buy the high-ticket as a result of booking a call in/at the end of the funnel is his rule of thumb. 3 is pretty good, and it can go up as high as 8 per hundred buyers from the front end immediately, but that requires a lot of optimization and work. One of the recent offers he worked on has a book-a-call rate of 80%, with the book-a-call positioned as the second upsell - it's doing $600k per month at 55% margins.

When there's low booking rates, Alen looks to the front-end sales asset to see if we are asking people to make a change they don't really want to or don't have the resources to make yet (agreement to change should happen on the call instead), or attacking their identity in some way. These can reduce booking rates later in the funnel, as it creates friction. This happens often when the opening of the VSL/TSL is very negative, and that negativity is attached to their identity. Alen suggests opening more positively and then dipping down - people resist negativity because we don't like to feel bad. Seasonality also affects this, as the less light we're exposed to the more sensitive we become to negativity.

23:26 - Isaak Asks: How To Go From Away To Toward Motivated?

We'll do a mindset exercise to help with this today. While everyone has some away motivation, and it's key to keeping us safe, Alen hasn't seen people who REMAIN away motivated maintain their success once they reach it. So it's okay to begin with away motivation to get us moving, and that's generally how it happens, but it's important to switch this over to "toward" as soon as we can because otherwise when we get far enough away from the thing we were pushing ourselves away from, we lose motivation. Today's exercise will help us with this.

25:45 - Declan Asks: How To Identify What The Subconscious Is Worried About Losing To Avoid Self-Sabotage?

The subconscious mind is always working to keep us safe. It can only occupy three states - past, present, and future. The conscious is seldom in the present; it's more often in the past or future. To work on what the subconscious is protecting us from, we can ask questions about the future/past such as, "Who am I when [goal]?" and then flip and ask, "Who am I NOT when I achieve [goal[?" The second question is more powerful than the first because it bypasses our brain's usual biases and pathways - what it believes to be true already - and allows us to seek out new evidence/possibilities.Once we have these new perspectives we can gain new insight and unlock ourselves/release those fear of loss breaks.

29:00 - Zalo Asks: Tips On Selling to 50+ Demos?

He's seeing low engagement with their book-a-call funnel, mostly men, after a survey on retirement scores.

With 50+, there are two major groups - those who have accumulated savings and other achievements and are now more focused on experiences, and those who focused on experiences first so now do not have those savings and achievements. People in this second category, who are now becoming aware of this problem and feeling negative, are likely who Zalo is reaching. Unfortunately, Zao is likely making them more aware of that negativity without providing what they need to resolve it - this makes them feel bad, unsafe, and uncertain. So since the mind works to keep us safe, they don't have the courage, confidence, or capability to even look at or engage with what he's saying, thus low engagement rates. The current sales process is taking them to too much of an unsafe space. This is also similar to people who are ill but don't want to go to the doctor because they are afraid to discover how bad it is and get a big bill. Most of Zalo's audience has low scores, so this lines up. It needs to be flipped into a positive and gentler experience, so they can feel hopeful that this will be solved.

Example: "You've had an amazing life, but some things got overlooked - one of them was the retirement plan. You're not the only one, X% of Americans are in this situation too, but it's not too late, and we can help you get this sorted out now..."

Alen adds that especially for a male audience, facing this problem means the men often have to go and admit to their wives or families and essentially admit that they've failed as leaders of the family. This is not something they want to do, so there will be a lot of resistance and sensitivity to the negative.

35:00 - Group Chat, Sharing Recent Wins and Breakthroughs

Alen adds that Ben took a position in the market many people weren't noticing or overlooking - he took the "FB Ad Guy" position and created a ton of opportunities for himself. We can do a call on how to identify and know which position to take based on the current market. When we can do this, creating positive client flow, revenue, and bigger opportunities becomes really easy - rather than just taking what we can get. Ben corroborates this; he only began studying ads and focusing on them last December and then took that position and ran with it.

Mindset Exercise Begins

39:00 - Reality In The Mind

The mind is incredibly CREATIVE, which is why it's so hard to "outsmart." Everything we buy, interact with, etc., has come from the mind of someone - the built environment and societies we experience now are the result of the immense creativity of the human mind.

We are never interacting directly with reality - only with the mental images/model that makes it through our sensory filters, including all our biases and limitations. This includes other people - we actually interact with ourselves because we're interacting with our internal models and projections of others rather than those people directly. Our senses are the "interface" with reality, not our minds directly.

However, this also means that everyone and everything within our minds is "ours" - and within our control. This is essentially what is meant by "controlling our perception/perspective." Everything we experience has an element of our creativity, because we create these mental models/images to interact with and interface with the real world since we're not experiencing it directly. Thus, our minds are IMMENSELY creative and are constantly "creating" the world we experience all the time.

44:00 - To Create New Realities, We Need To Understand How Change Processes Happen In The Mind

Because, without change, we cannot grow, get more, make more money, or do anything new/different at all. So if we're not experiencing the reality we want and still have a problem, there's something preventing change happening within our minds. Generally, we're unaware of this which is why it's so easy to get stuck. But once we know what's stopping us, and how to "work with it", change becomes much easier and faster. Then we see the changes in our reality as well.

The mind tends to operate on and default to dualities, because one cannot exist without the other. For everything, there is an opposite, and usually, the opposite dwells in our subconscious mind. We typically think of the subconscious as equal to the conscious mind, but the subconscious is MUCH larger and more powerful - it's a huge iceberg under the surface, while the conscious is just a sliver of the whole.

So when someone complains about something consciously, we can know there is a program that prevents them from resolving this lurking somewhere in the subconscious mind - they are worthless, helpless, or hopeless to the analog/opposite of the complaint. To complain generally indicates HOPELESS, as we only complain about something when we can't do anything about it yet - otherwise, we would just do what needs to be done to solve it (this is the PERCEPTION or BELIEF in the subconscious, regardless of whether they technically can solve it already; this lack of ability to solve it can also indicate lack of resources, including energy, needed to deal with it).

51:00 - Mental States: Acceptance or Resistance

The mind is generally in one of these states OR the other - acceptance OR resistance. We are generally taught and encouraged to be on the side of resistance - we are also wired with negativity biases for our survival, which contribute to a more automatic orientation to resistance (run from the threat, versus stay and accept impending death). Because of this, when we feel something pushing against us - like any kind of change we haven't chosen - we then push back and resist. We try to find shortcuts and avoid loss, rather than accepting the change. When we focus on resistance, we tend to have anger, fear, conflict, wars, and other low emotional states - fueling the "negative" or "destructive" side of the experience spectrum.

55:00 - Acceptance Is The Foundation of Growth

The only way to change is to ACCEPT change. This is why acceptance is the foundation of growth - without accepting change, we will resist the change that would allow us to grow and experience new realities. Any time you resist anything, there is a conflict between the subconscious, internal world, and the external. When we resist these types of things, it creates massive stress and strain in the mind and body, and then this manifests in the body negatively in the form of advanced/accelerated aging, illness, pain, disease (especially autoimmune disease), and so on. Those with a lot of resistance will generally be physically run down in at least one of these ways, and it can be very noticeable. (Example: People in the Depression era looked much more mature at younger ages than we tend to now - they had to "grow up" quickly and grapple with this struggle/resistance).

"That much gathers more is true on every plane of existence, and that loss leads to greater loss is equally true. 2. Mind is creative, and conditions, environment and all experiences in life are the result of our habitual or predominant mental attitude. The more you have, the more you'll get. The less you have the less you'll get."

These statements are really referring to acceptance vs resistance and how they subsequently create our realities. Those who accept more, receive more, because they are able to grow. Those who resist more, receive less, because they are resisting the growth they need in order to receive more (the container receiving must expand in order to receive more!).

We know this because nothing can grow without acceptance - we must receive the sustenance and resources needed to grow, such as food, water, air, money, opportunities, etc. And we cannot receive what we will not accept.

1:02:00 - There Is No Loss Without Gain, Or Gain Without Loss

Because of DUALITY in the mind, we cannot gain without losing and we cannot LOSE without GAINING. For example, if we lose a client, we gain the opportunity to get a better one or create our own offer with that time/energy. If we spend time going to get some Chipotle, we'll lose that time but we'll gain food.

So the secret to abundance, manifestation, and the easiest/fastest growth is to look for and focus on the gain, rather than the loss, in any change we experience. This allows us to be in a state of ACCEPTANCE (since the mind avoids loss, and will resist it for our safety) which allows us to receive what we need in order to grow. If we have a loss and we accept it, it's no longer because we gain growth. If we resist the loss, we cannot grow, and THAT is the loss which continues to compound.

Now that we are aware of this, we can be more intentional about choosing and staying in the state of acceptance, so our growth and manifestation will happen as easily and quickly as possible

1:05:00 - Resistance = Resistance To Change

Acceptance of the consequences of change - even when negative/not what we would like - is the gain of opportunity so we can grow. Thus to maximize our growth we need to train our minds to ACCEPT everything as it is and comes - both negative and positive possibilities - by looking for the gain/growth. Our situations cannot change if we don't accept them, so we need to let the universe flow. Otherwise, it's not that the things we want won't manifest, but that we won't LET them manifest because we are resisting the changes required to do so.

This means we have no choice but to accept reality as it is - and doing so is what GIVES us the power to choose, since we can choose the direction we move in more intentionally.

Because all thinking is a problem state, if we are thinking it means we are in a state of resistance. Once we accept things as they are, they shift into the subconscious pretty quickly and tension in the body is released. So anytime we have resistance, something is blocking us - and it's generally our unwillingness to accept change or desire to avoid change.

The only way out is through acceptance. All wars, conflicts, etc. are attempts to try and force acceptance and reconciliation between the internal and external worlds.

1:09:51 - Bas Asks: So In This Game There Are Ups and Downs, And If We Accept The Downs, Those Periods Would Possibly Be Shorter?

Well not necessarily - we accept the downs as they are and however long they last because they are what allow us to succeed. If there were no downs, everyone would always be killing it and there would be no opportunities for us to succeed. The whole game is about keeping away competition or outplaying them, and the downs we all experience make things harder for our competition when it's their turn to experience them, allowing us to succeed. Thus when things get harder, we can get excited because that's a good thing for us, long-term.

Acceptance won't speed it up, but resistance WILL slow it down. For example, if we don't accept that we don't know something, then how can we learn what we don't know? It is impossible to learn and grow without accepting that we don't know/have that knowledge and growth already. The longer we think we already know, the more time we waste that we could have spent learning and acquiring that knowing.

Our bodies have to accept food and water and air to grow, our minds have to accept new concepts, ideas, and realities in order to grow, and so on. Acceptance removes resistance and allows us to enter/remain in a creative state - which is a productive, growth state.

For example in entrepreneurship, Alen is in a state of acceptance and has grown to the point that money is like air - easily abundant to him. Money flows to him like wind in the trees that shakes it out. Resistance is more like going and shaking the tree to try and make the leaves rustle and rain ourselves.

1:14:33 - Riddhi Asks: How Do You Accept A Lost Relationship?

We have made room for BETTER ones - there is only so much time to meet and talk to amazing people. We can now meet someone else who is amazing in a better or different way.

Another perspective is that there are always pros and cons to being in a relationship and being single - we now have an opportunity to appreciate and enjoy the pros to being single, and by doing so are more likely to accept the change needed to move us to a place where we can meet our next partner, to gain the new love. So when we lose a relationship, we regain freedom, independence, and the opportunity to fall in love anew (one of the most wonderful things we can experience, which is why so many songs and stories are about it). When we gain a relationship, we gain support, companionship, and love, but lose some of our freedom, independence, and opportunity to fall in love.

There is always a trade-off; we can accept that it will be harder to meet new people than to stay with the previous partner, and then find the gain in the experience of doing so or being on our own anyway. Resisting this change will only prolong our pain, make the experience of healing and meeting new people harder, and delay new growth. Resistance magnifies and acceptance minimizes pain/struggle.

We won't know how to move forward until we accept that we have to; the how cannot come before the acceptance.

(Note: Acceptance is part of the healing process, and some people may need more time to grapple with the resistance to the change because this is often how we process and express the emotional realities the change has created in us - when the feelings associated with a change are negative, our default in current society is to avoid, suppress, repress, or otherwise bypass these feelings. Accepting requires us to accept how this has made us feel and actually FEEL that - avoiding the feelings is itself a form of resistance, as that energy remains stuck in us until we FEEL it, which allows it to move through and out of us. Then, we can move forward.)

1:19:29 - Isaak Asks: A Lot Of What I'm Doing Right Now Feels Like Busy Work - How Do I Turn This Into Acceptance?

We can just accept that it is busy work and find the benefits, like more reps, more data, more experience, etc. It's all moving us toward something better if we accept it; the issue crops up when we assume it will be like this forever. It won't be - this is just temporary, for right now. The sooner we accept this, the sooner we will pass through it and grow to make room for more and better.

1:22:07 - Romeo Asks: How Do We Accept More Clients Coming Our Ways If We're At Capacity/Have No Bandwidth?

First, we need to accept that we don't have any more bandwidth. Then we accept that the problem isn't the bandwidth, it's that we want to make more money. Bandwidth wouldn't be a problem if we didn't want to earn more. Then we accept that there's only two ways to make more - get more clients and deal with the loss of old ones, or charge more. Which one do you accept?

The way to do both is to charge new clients the higher rates and then when old clients come in to renew, we let them know the rates have gone up - they can choose to stay or not. If they don't, they make room for new clients who will pay those rates.

1:25:00 - Group Discussion Around Where We've Been Experiencing Resistance, and Tips For How To Overcome

1:28:14 - Jesse Asks: How Do We Handle/Accept Consequences Of Loss That Feel Bigger Than We Can Handle?

In Jesse's case he's worried that if he loses a client he may not be able to pay his bills and may have to go back to a job.

In this case, we accept that if that happens we will go back to our job. If that happens, we will gain more downtime and energy to grow because the job will provide more steady security and usually isn't as demanding as what we're doing here. We have all the time in the world to get better, we don't have to rush.

The point of this game isn't to make money, it's to do and enjoy the things/experiences/feelings money can help us get - money is just a tool, a byproduct of what we do to gain the growth and new realities we want. No matter what we do, we'll be working for a while because money is required to live - so it's okay if it's not what we want to be doing ideally, right away. We will get there, and we'll get there faster by making the most of where we're at right now and enjoying it - finding the gain and the positives.

Once we accept everything, the mind loses everything it can use to resist us, hold us back, sabotage us, etc. Then we can create freely.

1:31:35 - Ravi Asks: Can We Fit This Into The CBT Model As Well?

It's a bit different. Here we are talking about accepting the situation, the circumstances, and not so much the emotions, thoughts, and so on. Because once we accept the situation/circumstances, the thoughts, emotions, and behaviors all align with that to accept it - so it collapses that feedback loop and redirects it without having to work on each one at the more granular level.

We can learn marketing forever, but if we don't have acceptance, we cannot grow - and we'll instead work for someone who has that acceptance.

Awareness Bridge Call Begins

1:38:00 - Increasing Competition = Increased Opportunity For Those Who Are Skilled

Competition from other people also selling things to a limited population of buyers online will only increase as more and more people become aware of the opportunity to do so. As technology makes it easier, this will further increase.

Because of this, there is more CHOICE than ever before for our buyers. However, that also means that making choices is more difficult because there are more tradeoffs to weigh than ever before as well. So buying becomes even more energy-costly, and decision fatigue kicks in faster.

Many people in our space seem to believe that branding sucks and direct response is better, however because of this changing dynamic in the markets and it's continuing trend of increasing complexity and competition, that's not the case at all. Direct response works well to build momentum, but once we have it, branding is key to amplifying and maintaining momentum - a lot of companies figured this out a long time ago, which is why brands are worth billions and offers are worth a few million on average, dying out after a few years.

This means branding is actually more sophisticated than direct response, and they know something we don't know about how to affect choice.

1:41:00 - How Do We Affect Choice?

Right now there are thousands of watch brands, yet to those who can afford it, they tend to choose from: Rolex, Patek, AP, IWC, Grand Seiko, and Breitling. In marketing school, this is called an "evoked set" - the market leaders. But how did they establish and maintain that position - how did they affect choice in this way?

Choice depends on the amount of "awareness" we have - the more awareness we have, the more intent we can have. However, the paradox is that the more choice we have, the more curiosity we have as well - draining intent for one option because we're curious about what else is out there or could be better.

For example all these competing brands are generating interest in the sector - they are driving more awareness. In the marketing world, all "gurus" are generating awareness and interest in our space, and this is the same for every niche.

So the more curiosity/interest and awareness generated, the more curiosity we have and the less intent. This means we have access to more overall customers, but LESS actual paying customers and more difficulty ascending the ones who do buy in.

However, because most people want the outcome, not the product, when all things are equal, they will reliably choose the fastest, easiest, path of least resistance to that outcome.

And this is how we position our "awareness bridge" for ascension and a long-term sales relationship.

1:47:00 - Market Economics: Supply and Demand Equilibriums Of Consumption

The world and markets around us are constantly changing. In markets we have "market economics" - supply and demand. There is an equilibrium in every market between supply and demand... but this equilibrium is NOT static. It moves and swings one way or another depending on what is happening at the time, such as new technological innovations emerging.

For example: With A.I. production available now, "supply" or marketing messages and content goes through the roof. For some this may be an advantage, but for most it is actually a HUGE disadvantage. This is because creativity doesn't scale - and if it does, it becomes commodified, much like how 15 years ago web designers made great money and now they can be hired on Fiverr for $5. So while marketers are excited about AI because it "makes their lives easier," they are overlooking that it also makes everyone else's lives easier - increasing competition and overall market "noise" in a major way.

This means we now have too much production.

BEFORE A.I. / B.A.I. = the competitive advantage was on production, who can produce
AFTER A.I. / A.A.I. = the competitive advantage is on consumption, who can get them to consume - because there is a surplus of production and not enough demand to consume it all

As a result, while a few will thrive, most will not. And the ones who thrive will not win on production - they will win on CONSUMPTION. Because we do not make money on the production of goods/services, only on the consumption. This has happened many times in the past - when the means of production is made widely accessible, the brands who get CONSUMED the most win and own the market. The focus is shifted from general availability and quantity, to QUALITY, because there is an overwhelming quantity available.

We saw this happen with cola, and Coca Cola. With cars, like Ford and BMW. The Japanese concept of "kaizen" and "just in time production" is all about matching production as closely to consumption to avoid wasting energy/money on excess supply. This is because money is not made for these companies when the product is produced - only when it is consumed by a customer who buys and USES it. This is why branded ads for major players are all about consumption - we see people drinking Coca Cola in their ads, driving BMWs, and so on.

We can do the same thing now, in our own marketing, applying these lessons to compete on consumption rather than production.

1:54:00 - How Networks Extract Value: Consumption vs Production

No money is made when we write or produce copy, emails, offers, and so on. The money only comes when these assets are CONSUMED. And the best way to drive consumption is to create/amplify INTENTION - not just awareness and curiosity. This makes production a potential source of liability, rather than an asset - and this is what's happening with AI in our space. Because if everyone can do the same thing, then everyone will get the same result, and that lack of contrast drives the entire market down into a commodified marketplace.

Therefore, all competitive advantages will come from being able to get the audience to consume.

This is why "big business" calls them CONSUMERS, not buyers like we do. And this includes getting them to consume our thoughts, ideas, philosophies, principles, beliefs, rules, and so on - not just the product. Only after they consume those things, will they become consumers of the product and trade us their money.

To do this, we first need to build awareness.

Networks like YouTube, Facebook, and other social media networks understand this. So they do everything they can to encourage creators to produce content and build audiences on the network - they give free bandwidth, hosting, organic reach, etc. However, these creators aren't just building themselves up - they're building the network up. And they often don't realize this.

Because once the network hits a saturation point where the power shifts to it, it starts to treat creators as disposable and interchangeable assets - rather than the network serving creators, creators must serve the network and abide by its rules because the goal of the network is to keep users engaged and active there for as long as possible (so they can serve them more ads). The algorithm favors specific things like posting 2 videos a week on YT, and anyone who doesn't meet these requirements isn't promoted by it.

When this happens the only way to access audiences reliably will be through economics - whoever can pay for that access through the network's ad infrastructure (where they also benefit from offering the "shortcut") will win, with those who can pay more beating out those who can't. This is because consumption is limited - there are only 24 hours a day for people to be consuming content, and unfathomably vast amounts of content to choose from. Those who generate engagement are given preferential treatment, and everyone else who cannot or does not know how to do this must pay for those advantages.

This is how the network always wins, and why costs will always continue to rise, as we've seen with commercials, infomercials, radio spots, Google search, FB, and now YT, etc. When the extraction of value is optimized this way, markets move into lead generation models and the key becomes acquiring a relationship with the customer that is paid for ONCE, and then nurturing that relationship so they continue to consume and spend money with us over time.

If we can do this right, it doesn't matter how much it costs us to get the customer, because we know they will spend with us for the next 10+ years - and this is how major players like Apple operate (with these kinds of assumptions). This is why those who can scale in the negative for as long and as much as possible will generally win.

The way we can do this is with the awareness bridge.

As well, using the catalog model to create as many opportunities for sales as possible over time helps a lot - Russell Brunson and the CF brand have done this, for example. With a catalog, it's easier to recoup acquisition costs and drive profit, because we always have something else to sell them. We will do a full call on this in the future.

2:05:00 - Direct Response's Biggest Flaw

So the biggest flaw of Direct Response is that we pay for new customers again and again, because we don't have these long-term relationships built or in place, or catalogs of products to sell them.

To fix this, we must get our customers to CONSUME what we create, not just buy a product.

We see this reflected in supplement businesses too - they prioritize selling as many units as possible in the first purchase, because their customers don't reliably come back to purchase more again and again, consuming over time.

2:06:00 - Bas Asks: How Do We Have A Catalog Model In Weight Loss, Beyond Maintenance Of The Outcome?

We'll do a full call on this, but it comes down to mapping out the journey and creating products for each step of the journey, so we have something for everyone and something to offer as they progress through each step.

2:07:00 - Status: What Drives Consumption

In a network, STATUS is the key driver of consumption. Status drives price elasticity, because the higher the desire, the higher the demand, and the higher the price we can charge without lowering conversions.

On the consumption side, the higher the status, the more we can give and get them to consume, WITHOUT losing attention. We see this with big creators like Joe Rogan, who put out a lot of content with high consumption in the podcasting space.

Status is built in the mind through the accumulation of reference points - the more reference points a person/product/brand has in our minds, the more status we confer to it. For example, if 10 people know of Joe Rogan, on a scale of 1-10 we might give him a status of 2. But if 10 MILLION people know of him, he'd have a status around 8. To build these reference points requires us to get people to CONSUME whatever we are creating/offering, and then to get others to consume it as well, so it gains prevalence in the social environment. This is because people tend to mimic those around them, giving their attention and consumption to what other people do - a sociological effect we can leverage.

2:09:00 - The Awareness Bridge & Transformative Copy

When we use an awareness bridge, we change the nature of the sales interaction. In direct response or sales, most of the audience barely have enough awareness and are caught off guard in the sales process - so we have to sell to them, pretty hard. With an awareness bridge, they have awareness by the time they reach the sales interaction, so they are actually asking US to sell them/give them something.

For example, when Alen was doing sales calls he used to have to spend 45 minutes educating a prospect before they had the awareness they needed to buy - and by the end they didn't have the energy to close and complete the sale, because of decision fatigue. After switching this to an awareness bridge, people asked him to buy it by the time they reached the call.

To do this, our audience has to cross a "bridge" from unaware to aware, so they can get somewhere. The bridge takes them from who they are, what they know, what they think, what they believe is on the other end... to who they want to be, what they want to know, what they want to think, and what they want to believe is on the other end. We walk them across this bridge with our content.

But before we can do this, we need to build rapport with the customer so they trust us enough to follow our lead. Rapport is something that makes differences invisible to the subconscious/ego. This means that while contrast is the basis of attention, it is the enemy of rapport. If we have an ad that looks like everything else, there's no contrast, so it won't get attention because the mind won't notice it. The subconscious mind is attuned to notice differences in order to protect us from dangerous changes in the environment - this is why we learn through difference.

So contrast is what gets us there, but rapport is what keeps us there, since marketing is about differentiation but difference is a signal to the mind that something is/may be "unsafe."

All good movies, stories, songs and so on use this same process to MOVE us mentally and emotionally from where we were before, to a new state, through the rapport-building process that occurs when we RELATE to the content. So each video we make in our product/content needs to have this principle baked in.

We start where they are and transform their state, awareness, and/or sense of possibility by the end of each one - transforming who they are into who they could be, what they know into what they want to know, and so on.

2:14:00 - Isomorphic Stories and The Contrast of GOOD

This contrast of GOOD feelings relative to our starting state is what gives us an experience of VALUE. We relate to and build rapport with good stories because we can see ourselves in the characters - this is why all good characters are isomorphic. We don't know all the nitty-gritty practical details about Batman, we just see the struggles, qualities, and victories we can relate to and want to possess - this is what makes it possible for us to relate to them and see ourselves in them

In the awareness bridge, our story becomes their story. To do this well, we need to list out and include all the qualities, capabilities, and outcomes they want to possess. Many of these will be determined by their limiting beliefs. For example, if they're high worthless then a lot of the awareness bridge will talk about material success and achievement. If they're high helpless, it will be about knowledge and capability, and if they're hopeless it will be about hope and empowerment.

A good example of how this is done well in marketing and businesses like ours is Tony Robbins. We don't really know much about Tony personally, despite how long he's been in business. This air of mystery and separation is purposeful and important to maintain because once we know everything about someone, they become invisible to us - there's no contrast, no new surprise to be uncovered, nothing to intrigue us and keep us paying attention. (Making the mistake of feeling like we know our partners inside and out and forgetting they constantly change is a big part of why people "grow apart" and relationships break down, due to this same "invisibility" taking place - we then take our partners for granted.)

2:17:00 - The Awareness Bridge Is The Transformational Bridge

The transformation is what gives us value and worth, so in the awareness bridge they are the hero - they just don't know it yet, and we are making them aware.

It's this transformation that provides self-worth, hope, and confidence in our capabilities - what allows us to become who we secretly want to be. We can only do this when we are the character going through the journey - so the awareness bridge is the transformational bridge, and every step (video, product, etc.) they take transforms them into the hero. We went across this bridge first, and now we are the guide for them as they do the same, walking into a new skill set, life, possibility, and identity.

The transformation is symbolic, because our minds operate in symbols, and progresses like this:

Words -> Sentences -> Paragraphs -> Stories -> Images -> Feelings -> Symbols

We can tell a lot about someone's values based on the symbolism they choose/associate with. For exampleSomeone is into classic muscle cars. What Is the symbolism? Heritage, masculinity, power, strength, etc. Thus they're more likely to enjoy cigars and scotch as well, and using this symbolism in our marketing is likely to appeal to them and match their values/identity/criteria.

2:20:00 - People Build Rapport Over Limitations

We relate to shared flaws and struggles, not to perfection or qualities we do not yet have, and only idealize. This is why characters are isomorphic and must have flaws the audience relates to/understands. We know this is important because we only want to transform when we feel flawed in our own minds. So we connect and build rapport over limitations, barriers, struggles, obstacles, lack, and so on - we can see this in the way communities and movements form all over the world.

When we are the guru/mentor, we bond with the audience based on our PAST limitations (they have to be in the past for them to trust we know how to solve them!). We remember their limitations and what it took to overcome them, so we can help them do the same. If we still had these limitations, we couldn't be the guide as we would be the same as them - the same character.

So our origin story is about how we overcome the limitations that they have right now - this is the source of inspiration, which is the source of transformation. Only when we do this can we move together to transform them. (Example: Tony Robbins)

2:24:00 - Consequences Are The Primary Motivator For Most People

We are primarily motivated by consequences. The only time we have to deal with consequences is when we have limitations, and this is where our fear comes from. It's also why we tend to be the most afraid when we are alone, as we don't have access to support/resources to overcome these limitations and then have no choice but to suffer the consequences.

Therefore, making the audience feel like they're never alone is critical in the awareness bridge. Others are with them, others are on this journey, they are part of a group banding together to overcome this limitation.

Our leader has to be one of us, but better/the best of us.

2:28:00 - The Motivation Behind A Reward Is Still About Avoiding The Consequences of NOT Getting The Reward

We wouldn't have fear if we didn't have limitations, as we can only have consequences when our limitations keep us from succeeding/doing something that needs to be done - when we are unable to control our world.

Even when we are seeking a reward, the motivation behind that reward is the consequence of NOT getting it. So if we remove limitation, we remove fear, and we can move from resistance into acceptance - and from a low-ticket purchase into a high-ticket purchase, or wherever else we'd like our audience to ascend to.

So, we bond together over weakness and limitation in order to build rapport, unity, and pool our strength so we can overcome adversity together. Diversity exists and is so valuable because it contributes to that pool of strength and support needed to overcome adversity - if everyone had the exact same limitations/strengths there would be no difference in outcome whether we banded together or not. Therefore diversity is not about THEM being different or diverse, but US and what we add to their life/world in order to help them overcome their limitations. This is why we must present something new/different than what they already have, because otherwise what can we ADD that helps them overcome adversity?

When we do this well, by the end of the awareness bridge they feel connected to us and we have given them permission to move forward and work with us more. We do this by showcasing how we gave others the capabilities they needed to overcome the adversity - others who were just like them.

2:31:00 - Exchanging Beliefs: Turning Loss Into Gain, Resistance Into Acceptance

If all negative emotions are connected to loss, then all positive emotions are connected to gain. So how do we exchange beliefs? We turn losses into gains, which turns resistance into acceptance - allowing the exchange to take place. If we can do this for them, they will in turn be supportive of our growth because they will believe that the further we go, the further they can go one day as well. This is because they see themselves in us. If we move too far away/ahead of them and disconnect, we will lose their support.

So our audience MUST see themselves in us.

We can also create limitations in order to move them into different positions and create the need to exchange beliefs. To do this we need to know where limitations come from - such as from lack of time, capability, energy, opportunity, awareness, etc. Then we can make them aware of this source of limitation, and remove it for them. This will exchange their belief of the problem and their capability to overcome it. When we do this, we remove fear and limitation, and facilitate the transformation they are seeking through the removal of all associated resistance.

2:32:00 - Recap and Summary Of The Awareness Bridge

As more choice becomes possible in the market, it becomes more difficult to choose. We need to build massive awareness to help them decide what choice to take - this is what huge brands are doing all the time with product placements, celebrity endorsements, billboards and so on.

The awareness built is of the possibility of transformation - we buy products to gain identities we aspire to. So purchases are transformational events. In order to get them to CONSUME the product and actually go through the transformation, we need to remove their resistance to it. We use the awareness bridge to do this. In it, we show them how to overcome their existing limitations step by step, removing the limitations, fear, and all resistance. They can then move forward into the transformation, becoming consumers instead of just customers, and making it more likely they will continue to purchase from us again and again.
